The Leopard

Juanita Carbery spent her childhood in Africa, on a coffee farm in Kenya. Here she writes about a terrifying experience.

When I was on my own with my stepmother, I would sleep, not in my usual room at the nursery end of the house, where the windows had wire mesh across them, but in one of the bedrooms close to the drawing-room which looked out on to the veranda. Because of my African childhood I am not afraid of much in the natural world. But I am afraid of leopards. Even when I see one in a zoo and our eyes meet, I can feel the hairs on the back of my neck prickle. It is a well-founded terror. The leopard is a dangerous, unpredictable animal who, unlike most of the other cats, is not afraid of man. Leopards roamed Kenya in fairly substantial numbers. I would often lie awake in bed in the pitch dark and imagine that a leopard was crouched outside, waiting to spring in through my window. I was not allowed to have a light on, even though I was always frightened of the dark and I was obliged to leave my window open because the adults thought fresh air was healthy. This may seem odd, in view of the presence of leopards, but though leopards had been known to take dogs off the veranda, it was unusual for them to come into a house.

That night, as I lay in bed, I heard a rustling on the veranda. I switched on my light and looked out of the window, my heart thudding. Crouched under the ping-pong table immediately outside, ready to spring, was the embodiment of all my terrors. The leopard's eyes reflected the light in my bedroom like the fluorescent green hands of a luminous clock. His gaze held me and paralysed me. Leopards do this. I have seen one walk up to an antelope and kill it without encountering any resistance. I stood mesmerised, looking into its lit-up eyes. Then suddenly I snapped to. I gave a blood-curdling scream and rushed out of my bedroom door into the passageway. Still screaming my head off, I headed for my stepmother's room. As I ran I tried to slam the door behind me but, as happens in nightmares, I didn't have any shove and it didn't shut. As I hammered in panic on the door of my stepmother's room, I knew the leopard must be close behind me and turned, sobbing to face it. But it wasn't a leopard. It was Gatimu who, hearing my screams, had rushed in from the courtyard to protect me. I gasped out 'Chui! Chui!' which means leopard in Swahili. Gatimu ran off into the dining-room, took out a gun from the cupboard and went after the leopard, which by now was running away across the lawn. It had been a close call.
